About Associate Professor Sean Field: I am fascinated by how people consciously and unconsciously narrate their stories to others. My academic career has involved the practise and teaching of oral history methodology. My PhD (from University of Essex) was on the Windermere/Kensington community and apartheid forced displacements and was completed in 1996. I began work in the Department in 1997 as coordinator of the Western Cape Oral History Project, and I also served as Director of the Centre for Popular Memory (CPM) from 2001 to 2012. My current research involves: (post)colonial oral histories of violence, and debates about trauma theory, memory, and psychoanalysis.
